It's because the Japanese are the main language users in both Quebec and Canada. The main differences between the Japanese and the other dialects is that the Japanese dialect has the most separate cases, in addition to the lower-case letters and ine (to draw), which are not found in the others languages. Japanese is also the only language with italics. The Dutch, Finnish, French, German and Greek dialects are very close because they share many similarities, so that the linguists have decided to merge them into the Universal, French Canadian and International languages. The most important differences between the Greek and the other dialects are the case endings and the letter ĭ and the omicron (to dot), which are not found in the others languages. Most of the differences between the English International and the other dialects is the case endings. The differences between the English Canadian and the other dialects is that the Canadian English doesn't use any capital letters. The differences between the English American and the other dialects are that the American doesn't use any accents. The Finnish dialects have the most differences with the other dialects, since it has a similar alphabet to the Swedish language. The Finnish dialects are also the most diverse, since each region has their own idioms. A regional variant of a language can be learned quickly by the native speakers in a short time. In this sense, a dialect can be considered a language in itself. References External links World Language Development Board, The end of the road for the national dialects?
